(46~50) In the United States, size zero is a women's clothing size, roughly equivalent to a size four in the UK or a size 32-34 in the rest of Europe. It is considered to be a very small size. Recently, in the European fashion industry, size zero has come to be regarded as a strictly negative concept and has received a lot of bad publicity.

In Spain in 2006, the organizers of Madrid Fashion Week banned the participation of models who had a body mass index (BMI) of less than 18, which more or less corresponds to size zero. A person's BMI is their weight-to-height ratio, and a BMI of less than 18 is perceived as unhealthy by the World Health Organization (WHO).

There has been much debate concerning the possible effects on easily influenced teenagers of the use of underweight models by the fashion industry. The wish to attain a size zero has been linked to health conditions such as anorexia nervosa. In order to become so thin, many young women have to lose a lot of weight, and that is where serious problems may begin.

Not long ago, a model called Luisel Ramos, aged 22, died of a heart attack after trying to live on just Diet Coke and lettuce leaves. Her death was blamed on inadequate nutrition and, indirectly, the size zero trend. Brazilian model Ana Caroline Reston also died after suffering from anorexia nervosa. She had tried to lose weight by eating only apples and tomatoes.
